Medical Education

Medical aptitude and its assessment

MINU MARY MATHEW, KENNEDY ANDREW THOMAS

ABSTRACT

The assessment of the suitability of an individual for the profession of medical science is carried out worldwide on the basis of several yardsticks. While a few methods assess domain knowledge of sciences, others focus on evaluating the cognitive aptitude skills of the candidate, while few others assess communicative skills. Though it has been considered that the possession of an aptitude for the profession is a prerequisite, considering its strenuous demands from the candidate, a comprehensive assessment of these areas under the construct of medical aptitude has not been analysed so far, though medical aptitude has been socially defined. This article attempts to develop a comprehensive construct to 'Medical aptitude', meant for the pre-medical student, which has been encapsulated with respect to the areas of its assessment. We did an extensive survey of the literature pertaining to the mode of selection of students towards medical profession and analysed their areas of assessments for admittance. This enabled to identify similarities in the areas of assessment which were then classified under several domains of assessment. Special reference to the keywords involving 'Aptitude' and 'Medical Aptitude' was made. We analysed the definitions to the construct of aptitude from the literature with respect to its relevance in the profession of medical science to be possessed by the pre-medical aspirant—in context. From this, a new construct of medical aptitude was formulated incorporating the existing construct of medical aptitude. Medical aptitude is a comprehensive construct that encompasses the dimensions of a consistent core, a peripheral content and the support of a scaffold. Each of these dimensions have their importance and distinct objective in being assessed in the pre-medical student. A perfect intertwining of these 3 dimensions can prove beneficial in assessing individuals to be fit for the profession of medical science.

INTRODUCTION

Medical science is a complex course of professional studies offered in countries all over the world. The number of aspirants for the course in any country is larger than the number of positions available, suggesting that medical science is still one of the most sought after professions. This popularity can be attributed to several reasons ranging from a willingness to serve humanity through the profession,¹ parental influence,² influence from peers and relatives,³ acquisition of high social status,⁴ prestige associated with the profession⁵ and respect and honour accorded to the profession.⁶ The admission and selection criteria of medical aspirants is a rigorous process and involves competition of a high order. Medical science requires the candidate to have adequate intra- and interpersonal skills, a flexible approach to arrive at decisions, professionalism and an indomitable zeal to strive under stringent conditions, apart from possessing academic and clinical mastery of the subject. Assessing such individuals for admittance to the course is a challenge as it ranges from assessing knowledge of students in the spheres of pure sciences, cognitive aptitude and communication skills.

METHODS

We did a literature review from January 2015 to September 2017 using JSTOR, ProQuest, Google Scholar and PubMed. We searched for key words and phrases such as 'reasons for joining medical profession', 'attitude towards medical profession', 'aptitude', 'aptitude for medical profession', 'assessment of medical aptitude' and 'aptitude for pre-medical aspirants'. These keywords led us to an amalgam of books in educational psychology, research articles from medical journals, review articles, research papers, short communications, documents, publications and reports from government organizations, prospectus of medical institutions, editorials, websites of organizations and institutions responsible for conducting tests for admittance to the medical profession, published legal information, reports and documents published from the Medical Council of India (MCI) and the General Medical Council (GMC) of the UK, conference proceedings, chapters from electronic books and prospectus of agencies assessing the entry of pre-medical students. These 62 documents were reviewed. If full-text articles could not be traced, their abstracts were referred to. The articles were categorized based on the content of the paper and its respective subheadings.

Of the 62 documents, 11 research papers dealt with reasons for adolescents choosing the profession, 6 research papers citing peer influence, parental influence, societal expectations, self-interest and motivation were studied in depth as the data were obtained from empirical studies. The rest were not included as these were non-empirical. The articles chosen dealt with the concept of 'attitude towards the medical profession' that is essential for medical aptitude, which is the focus of our article. There were 6 documents with regard to 'Aptitude and its assessment' including books. Two articles in this section drew differences in the assessment of examinations and aptitude tests with special focus on essential aptitudes that doctors should possess. Five articles highlighted the existing lacunae among Indian medical graduates
